What is Outbound Marketing?

Outbound Marketing, also referred to as 'Interruption marketing' consists of marketing tactics that push a message to a large amount of people in the form of print/TV/radio advertising, cold calling, direct mail, email blasts and other various methods that 'interrupt' people. Outbound marketing is viewed as a one-way conversation in which the marketer is constantly pumping messages at the user, whether or not the user wants to listen. And, often, whether or not the user is in the need for the product or service at that moment in time.

What is Inbound Marketing?

Instead of trying to appeal to anyone with a pulse (which is a waste of time, money and energy), inbound marketing helps you focus on people who are already researching your industry. Think about it: when we have a problem we use Google. For instance, you may have typed in a google search something like: "Gutter Cleaning Best Practices" or "iPhone Screen Damage Repair." Businesses who use inbound marketing attract these online search inquiries by focusing on their buyer personas, creating content and interactions that potential customers would find useful and relevant, rather than intrusive and interruptive. There are numerous ways to provide useful content to prospects: blogs, tipsheets, eBooks, guides, etc. The more you publish this content, mixed-in with a solid SEO plan, the more your business will show up on Google, in front of prospects. Since inbound marketing focuses on creating quality content that naturally pulls prospects to your company, it's no surprise that this tactic brings in the best leads. If you're not using inbound to grow your business, why not?
